Farmer as Gentleman Poet

far from your world an archer wills his arrow straight to the target you think what zen might do for birdshot water the tomato plants hang a dead crow in the cherry branches and pick what is left of the cherries nothing magical in this everything fits into the natural order water plants birds on the earth pulled by occasionally visible forces now that they’re visible you compose in your mind the wonderful mondo does my wife love me the crow’s cawing question and answer that’s answer enough satisfied you aim your 10-gauge shotgun high the crows seem to know and accept what is coming they explode in the cherry branches petals and feathers float to earth reminding you of the north american tanka competitions and the hard edges even the gentlest of farmwives give to their poems soft at the core as if the very mention of cherry blossoms were ornamentation and significance enough yet no stiff crow ever hangs upside down in the branches that project abruptly into the mist like your wife now approaching with four cherry buckets you slip another shell into its chamber now you are aiming high

—Derk Wynand