

urbanized, industrialized man into his society and to foster a sense of human community that transcends the narrow bounds of space and time.

The gaps in space and time can be bridged by electronic equipment which only an affluent society can afford. And new types of community development that bridge the gap between the governors and the governed may be possible with the use of such equipment and with people firmly in the forefront of development. There is an opportunity in the North to put into practice some of the ideas of Marshall McLuhan—ideas which, far from being wild, visionary, and futuristic, may well prove to be the most efficient and quickest way, economically and socially, of bringing about community development in the Northwest Territories.

Old men
never start wars: they provide them. For
where the wars
begin,
go to the young
lovers
with flags
tattooed on their skin.

For where the wars
start,
go to the young lovers
and the pure
in heart.
