The air here is as moist as the young woman who walked by us yesterday, waves caressing sand as she moved her legs together. At least I imagined her wet as she looked at you her water tipping toward your lips like the wine you drank with your lobster.

And I marvelled you could hear the ocean sibilant in her thighs, above the steady tide of my estrogen ebbing away.